The Test Kitchen
Last summer No Kid Hungry tested four ideas that they thought might increase access to summer meals. Experimentation at the local level was not only successful; it also helped identify program improvements and strategies that have the potential to improve user experience nationally. But they’re just getting started. No Kid Hungry is looking for four more organizations to work with them this summer to test concepts that respond to the following question: How might we ensure that more kids in rural communities have access to food in the summer? View the Request for Proposals. Selected organizations will meet at an in-person training in April, and receive technical assistance and $10,000 to pilot their idea. To apply, organizations should submit a proposal that explains the idea they would like to test and how this new strategy or program might ensure that more kids in rural communities receive meals in the summer. Proposals must be submitted to innovation@strength.org by January 10.
